Honokone, April 4rm, 1889. In the educational report for 1888 Dr. EITEL deals at some length with the question of female education in the colony. Of the FOURTEEN THOUSAND AND SIX HUNDRED 8,402 children in Hongkong who remain uneducated, a vast majority are girls. As of the colony the provision of suitable educaregards Chinese girls whose parents do not aim higher than giving their daughters a tional facilities for girls is a subject that ought to command earnest attention, and the The HAPS and PLANS have been mostly purely Chinese, that is, non-English, education, Dr. Erren says the Crant-in-Aid Public School already possesses an organisa-Scheme is doing, or is capable of doing if lion that might be readily made to meet the availed of, all that is needful. leading an immoral life could not receive. The Siam Mercantile Gasette makes the folmoral training at home, and in a non-sectarian school such as that suggested by Dr. Errer nothing in the shape of religious instruction could be given. With regard girls of this class, therefore, the school would probably do more harm than good, for it would doubtless attract a number who at present do enjoy some advantages of meral training by being sent to sectarian schools.

With regard to Chinese and Eurasian girls, therefore, the Government does not seem called upon to do much more than it is doing at the present time by the Grant-in-Aid scheme. There remains the case of European girls to be considered. Here, again, no permanent claim can be made on the Government, the girls being with very few exceptions the children of parents who can well afford to pay for their education. There erists, however, a great want for a good girls' school in the colony. Dr. Erren says :-So far as Roman Catholic girls are concerned, be they of native or foreign extraction, ample provision has been made, under the Grant-in-Aid Scheme, for a modicum of female education. As regards Protestant

European girls, there are two small private schools which might be enlarged or added to, with or without the help of the Grant-in-Aid Scheme, if the demand for female education by this acction of the community were not so small and not so hedged in with religious and social casts projudices. The demand is, however, constantly increaserected on a site provided by the Government. The Public School answers fairly well the requirements as regards the education of European boys, and advantage might appro printely be taken of the removal of the school to extend the sphere of its operations so as to include girls. Whether the education should be separate or mixed is a matter. of detail into which it is unnecessary to enter at present, but at very little increase of cost the building might be arranged to accommodate girls as well as boys, and if the two divisions were worked in conjunction a smaller staff would suffice than for two totally separate institutions. With the increasing numbers of the European population

JOHN DALE. In the cabin of the Conquoring Quean, M Ponnycomequick had much time for thought before he was sufficiently recovered to leave his borth. He fell to wondering what Salome and her mother, Mrs. Sidebottom and his nephew. had thought of his disappearance.

"Can you got me a back newspaper, or some account of the flood?" he asked of Ann Dewis "I am interested to hear what happened, and whether I am among those accounted to have fallen victims."

After several trials, Mrs. Dewis product what was required in pamphlet form-a reprint from one of the West Riding papers of its narrative of the inundation, of the appearance of could manage to knock off work altogetherthe country after it had subsided, from its special correspondent, and full lists of the lost and drowned. Mr. Pernycomequick read this account by the light that descended from the hatchway; road about the havon effected in Kald-dale, the walls thrown down, the cottages immulated, the roads and the embankments form up, and then among the names of those lost he read his own, with the surprising information that the hody had been recovered, and though frightfully mutilated, had been identified

This was news indeed. That he was esteemed dead did not surprise Mr. Pennycomequick when he learned how long he had been ill, but that some other body should have been mistaken for his was indeed inexplicable.

"By this time," said be to himself, " Salome will have proved my will and Louisa will have exhausted her vituperation of my memory." It took him two days to digest what he had. learned. As he recovered, his mind recurred to those thoughts which had engaged him on the night of the flood, as he walked on the towpath by the canal.

If he were to return to Mergatroyd when supposed to be dead, he was confident that Salome and her mother would receive him with unfeigned delight, and without reluctance surrender to him what they had received through his bequest. But he was by no means sure of himself, that in the joy of his return he would be able to control his feelings so as not to show to Saloms what their real nature was.

He recalled his prayer to Heaven, that he might have the way pointed out to him which he should go, and startlingly, in a manner unexpected, in a direction not anticipated, the hand of Providence had flashed out of the sky and had pointed out his course. It had snapped his tie you the truth, I have reasons which make me to Mergatroyd-at all events temperarily; had separated him from Salome, and set him where he had leisure and isolation in which to determine his conduct. - Jeremiah was a man of religious mind, and this consideration profoundly affected him. He had been carried from his home, and his name blotted out of the book of the living. What would be the probable consequences were he to return to Mergatroyd as soon as he was recovered? The very desire he felt to be back, to see Salome again was so strong within him that it constituted evidence to his mind that it he were at home, in the exuberant joy of meeting her again he would let drop those words which his judgment told him ought not to be spoken. Other thoughts beside these exercised his mind.

He turned to the past, to his dead brother Nicholas and his consolence repreached him for having maintained the fend so persistently and. so remorselessly. Nicholas had suffered for what he had done, and by suffering had expiated his fault. Ho, Jeremiah, had, moreover, visited on the guiltless son the resentment he bore to the father. He endeavoured to pacify his conscience by the reflection that he had made a provision for Philip in his will; but this reflection exclude him from the firm without a trial of his worth.

Then he turned to another train of ideas connected with his present condition. Was his health likely to be sufficiently restored to enable him to resume the old routine of work? Would a resumption of his duties conduce to the re-edification of his health P Would it not retard, if not prevent, complete recovery? Would it not be a better course for him to shake himself free from every care-keep his mind disengaged rheumatic fever often seriously affected the heart him to go abroad for a twelvementh or more, to your pet Salome is honourably and even handsome place where his mind might recover its spmely treated by them." balance, his health be re-established and he

He would be sorry to think that Pennycomequick should cease to be known in Yorkshire as the title of an old established reliable business associated with figured linea damasks. But was his presence in the factory essential to its continuance? He looked at Ann Dewis squatted by the fire smoking. For seventeen years she had kept Earle Schofield's pipe going, which he had put into her mouth and she had been faithful to a simple request. He had put his mill into Salome's hands, and had said, Keep 'it going. Was she less likely to fulfil his wish than had been Ann Dewis to the desire of Earle-Schofield?-

subsistence should be determine to remain as one dead Ho had an old friend, one John Dale, at Bridlington, the only man to whom he was not reserved and suspicious the only man of whom he took connsel when in doubt and difficulty. John Dale had a robust commonsense, and to him Jeremiah resolved to apply. When John Dale first went to Bridlington he had been lent a considerable sum of money by his friend, which had not been repaid, but which, now that Dale had established a good practice as a surgeon, he

He had paid visits to Mergatroyd, and Jeremiah had visited Bridlington; but as both were busy men, such visits had been short and few. Though, however, they saw little of each other, their mutual friendship remained unimpaired.

As soon as Mr. Pennycomequick was sufficient. ly recovered to leave the barge, he provided himsalf with a suit of clothes at a slop-shop, and settled into an inn in the town of Hull, whence he wrote to Dale to come to him. His cheeriness, his refusal to take a gloomy view of a case, made him popular, and perhaps went some way towards encouraging nature to make an effort to throw off disease. Jeremiah teld him the story of his escape. "And now," said Dale, "I suppose you are geing back. By Jove, I should like to see the faces when you reappear in the family circle never have done; you are right, it would never thus dressed and behaired."

"I do not believe it. You have an aversion to lawyers, but let me tell you that a lawyer's office is an excellent school; there men learn to know human nature, how to deal with men, and get business habits. The follow must have a good heart or he would not have come to an arrangement with his sunt to part with a large sum of money for Salome. Besides, Salome is no fool, and she writes of him in high praise for his diligence, his regular habits, and his kindness and consideration for her mother." John Dale passed for Jeremiah to say something, but his friend remained silent, with his head down, thinking. "If you go back," said the doctor, "you wil throw everything wrong. You will worry your self and will take the spirit out of Philip. Trust him. He is on his mettle. If he makes a blunder, that is natural and he will suffer for it, but he will commit none that is fatal, he is too shrewd for that."

"Dale," said Mr. Pennycomequick, " if I make up my mind not to return to Mergstroyd, I make up my mind at the same time to leave those there in ignorance that I am still alive." "As you like. It would not be amiss. Then Philip would work with better energy. If things go wrong I can always drop you a line and recall you, and you can appear as Deus ex machina, and set all to rights. I have often thought that half the aggrevation of leaving this world must be the seeing things going to sixes and sevens without being able to right them, a business we have got together being scattered, a reputation we have built up being sovereigns, sufficient to satisfy his immediate pulled down; to have to see things going contrary to our intentions, and be unable to put out "Pon my word, never was so astonished in a finger to mend them, to hear ourselves criticismy life," shouted John Dale, as he burst into ed, and ill-natured and false stories told of us,
